Have you ever been a victim of a crime at school? In some schools, children and teachers are frightened to go to school because there is so much crime. Until now, the police couldn't do anything about it because witnesses were too frightened to talk to them. But now, thanks to modern technology, there may be an answer to the problem.

The police in the town of Franklin, USA, have thought of a clever idea. Students can now send anonymous text messages from their mobile phones to the police department. Before the police see the message, a company called Citizen Observer removes the phone number and replaces it with an ID number. It is impossible to discover where the messages come from, so students aren't frightened to send them. The police can then send a reply, and have a conversation with the student. This way, the police can get the information they need.

Young people can send text messages quickly and easily, so the solution is perfect for them. Now more young people are helping to fight crime in their schools and communities.
